IT IS ORDERED that this cause shall be reheard by the court en banc with oral argument on a date hereafter to be fixed. No. 25-30324

STEPHEN A. HIGGINSON, Circuit Judge, dissenting from the order granting rehearing en banc:

Just a few weeks ago, Justice Thomas, writing alone, asked lower courts to reexamine the constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g) under the Commerce Clause. See United States v. Hemani, 146 S. Ct. 1677, 1694 (2026) (Thomas, J., concurring). Already, our court answers the call. Today, we grant a petition for rehearing in what was a Second Amendment as-applied challenge to § 922(g)(1), now reframed as a facial¹ Commerce Clause challenge. So, rather than clarifying our § 922(g)(1) as-applied precedent to provide fair notice to people in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas about whether they can lawfully own guns, see, e.g., United States v. Cockerham, 162 F.4th 500, 518 (5th Cir. 2025) (Higginson, J., dissenting), we imperil much of the United States Code.²

Squire asks us to rehear his case to “apply” United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995), to § 922(g)(1), but what he really asks is that we expand it. Familiar to us all, Lopez described three categories of congressional commerce authority: (1) power to “regulate the use of the channels of interstate commerce”; (2) power to “regulate and protect the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities”; and (3) power to regulate “activities that substantially affect interstate commerce.” 514 U.S. at 558–59. With that framework, the Supreme Court affirmed our court’s holding that the then-in-force 18 U.S.C. § 922(q) exceeded Congress’s Commerce Clause authority because it “neither regulate[d] a commercial activity nor contain[ed] a requirement that the possession be connected in any way to interstate commerce.” Id. at 551.

Unlike the § 922(q) provision discussed in Lopez,³ the § 922(g) provision at issue here has a textual interstate commerce nexus. See 18 U.S.C. § 922(g) (prohibiting the transport of any firearms or ammunition “in interstate or foreign commerce,” possession of any firearms or ammunition “in or affecting commerce,” and reception of “any firearm or ammunition” transported “in interstate or foreign commerce” by certain groups of individuals). Concluding that none of Lopez’s three categories could sustain § 922(g) would be a significant departure from existing, settled, and binding Commerce Clause jurisprudence. Cf. Rehaif v. United States, 588 U.S. 225, 230 (2019) (discussing Congress’s “constitutional authority to regulate [a criminal] defendant’s conduct (normally, as here, through its Commerce Clause power)” (citing Torres v. Lynch, 578 U.S. 452, 466–67 (2016))). Indeed, at the circuit level in Lopez, our court distinguished § 922(g) from § 922(q), deeming the former constitutional: “[T]he possession offense of thus amended section 922(g) ‘reaches only those firearms that traveled in interstate or foreign commerce and is thus constitutional.’” Lopez, 2 F.3d at ³ After Lopez, that provision was quickly amended to add a Commerce Clause hook. See S. 890, 104th Cong. § 2 (1995); 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(2)(A) (“It shall be unlawful for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm that has moved in or that otherwise affects interstate or foreign commerce at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone.”).

1355 (emphasis in original) (quoting United States v. Wallace, 889 F.2d 580, 583 (5th Cir. 1989)); id. at 1347–48 (“Because a commerce nexus is an element of the crime defined by section 922(g), each application of that statute is within the commerce power.”). We reaffirmed that decision after Lopez, too, joining a consensus of circuits.⁴ See United States v. Rawls, 85 F.3d 240, 242 (5th Cir. 1996) (per curiam) (“Today we join all other circuits that have considered the issue post-Lopez and hold that neither the holding in Lopez nor the reasons given therefor constitutionally invalidate § 922(g)(1).”). Finding that this statute, with an explicit interstate commerce nexus, must fall would mark the start of a new, severely contracted Commerce Clause era.

Of course, we have not yet seen briefing from the parties and amici (in a case of this magnitude, likely including the Solicitor General, state solicitors general, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, Commerce Clause scholars, and others, maybe counsel from the newly created Supreme Court Advocacy Program), have not yet heard oral argument, and certainly have not voted on the merits of this case as an en banc court. However, in granting the petition to rehear this case, our court has welcomed the possibility of finding that Congress’s Commerce Clause authority cannot support § 922(g). If so, this case would have massive import for federal law.

That impact is hard to overstate. In the context of § 922 convictions alone, such a holding would raise several immediate questions. Can felons from the other eleven circuits now flood the Gulf Coast to rearm themselves?

⁴ Every other circuit has also held § 922(g) constitutional under the Commerce Clause. See Government’s Opposition to Petition for Rehearing En Banc at 2–3 (collecting cases). Some scholars think similarly. See, e.g., Alisa B. Klein, Right Diagnosis, Wrong Cure: Reconceptualizing the Commerce Clause Basis for the Federal Prohibition on Felon Firearm Possession, 104 TEX. L. REV. ONLINE 225 (2026).

No. 25-30324

Can—or must—all § 922(g) defendants in this Circuit now individually challenge their convictions on these grounds? What is the retroactive effect, if any, of this decision for the people in our Circuit already convicted under this statute?

More broadly, what would come of the countless other federal statutes hinging on Congress’s well-settled commerce authority? Can the federal government no longer criminalize possession of child pornography? Of explosive materials? Of biological weapons? Past the Title 18 level, do we lose regulations on financial transactions? On intellectual property? On endangered species?

All told, this case hazards untold consequences for federal law. What was a Second Amendment as-applied challenge to § 922(g)(1)—where we have studiously avoided taking an inter-circuit split and our own intra-Circuit split en banc—now leaps beyond the felon-in-possession statutes, beyond federal criminal law, and beyond our authority as an inferior court. I dissent.
